

Carl Jung and the Bruchlinien concept

Eminent psychologist Carl G. Jung, in a letter dated 16 October 1932, sent to the North American doctor Smith Ely Jelliffe, described the pathological symptoms of his schizophrenic patients, while at the same time sending him his comments on the drawings they were creating. Jung drew an explanatory diagram on what he called "Bruchlinien", a term coined by him to refer to a line dividing the image and which apparently was indicative of the patient's mental state. For Jung, the question came from whether this unconscious symbolisation was significant or simply a reaction to something, such as past events.
